

The information that we publish on the Internet.

As part of the move to e-enable services, we are asked to make information from our planning and building control registers and databases available on our website. Given that this may result in some personal information about individuals being disclosed it is important that we comply with the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1998. As placing information on the Internet makes the information more widely available, allows for browsing and searching, and facilitates copying and re-use of information, it is very important to consider the Data Protection implications. In this regard we will follow the advice published by the Planning & Regulatory Services Online (PARSOL) publication: Planning and Building Control Information Online – Guidance notes for practitioners publication which incorporates advice from the Information Commissioner and the Director of E-Planning at what was the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.
